Salary For New Grads

Landing that first job is what most people that are fresh out of college are excited to do. Most grads only had a part time job while studying or they do not have work experience which is why it is not easy to secure an executive position right away.

Aside from starting from scratch, one also has no choice but to start from the bottom in an entry-level position then in time move to the top. The challenge most grads face in applying for a job is the competition. Aside from those who just graduated, there are also those who have left the previous job and are looking for a new one.

There is not that much room to negotiate when one is just a fresh grad and this is according to hiring and compensation experts. This is because that person does not have substantial work experience as basis to negotiate for a higher wage compared to those who have already worked before.

The range of the salary fresh grads get are based on the course one has finished in college. To those who volunteered to be surveyed, it was found that people who graduated from the sciences were able to get a higher salary compared to those who graduated from the liberal arts.

A tip that may help a little in the negotiation process is knowing your potential and not easily giving in or selling yourself short. During the interview, what it will boil down to is the amount that you will be getting. What most grads do is accept what is given immediately and reply okay which ends it there.

It is best to only talk about the salary when an offer has been made. It can wait if the interviewer is good. During that time, how much the company will give for someone in that position is what one can ask then be able to negotiate about that further later on regardless of the figure that was given.

Asking questions such as job responsibilities and mention that the contribution one can give to the company is more important than the salary you will be receiving showing the recruiter you are a team player is what the applicant will be able to do.

By doing research about how other companies are offering for the same job before giving an immediate answer, the applicants can negotiate more. By knowing that information, it is possible for you to negotiate the salary offered for a little more.

Salary is not the only reason for getting a job. Other things that the company offers to its employees are included and it can also help in deciding whether the applicant should accept the job or not by thoroughly checking out the other benefits and perks.
